SUNDOWN FOR THE SWC?

TCU not among four conference schools invited to join Big 8

Fund raising unaffected, officials say

BY KRISTI WRIGHT
TCU DAILY SKIFF

The construction of the university's athletic complex and fund-raising for university athletics is continuing as scheduled, despite the announcement Monday that excluded TCU from being invited to join the Big Eight athletic conference in 1996.

Will Stallworth, director of the physical plant department, said not being invited to join the Big Eight would not affect the building of the weight training and rehabilitation center.

"Just because we aren't a member of a certain conference, it doesn't mean we won't need a facility for our athletes to train," Stallworth said. "Whether we are in the Southwest Conference or Division II, I think the project will go on as scheduled."

The $2.5-million facility is scheduled to be completed by Sept. 1. Donors have pledged enough money to fund the building of the complex, but it has not been collected.

Hal Roach, director of athletic fund-raising for university advancement, said the financial support from alumni, friends and corporations for the university's programs, including athletics, should continue.

Donors who provide money for the athletic programs believe in the goals of the university and what the athletics department is trying to accomplish, Roach said.

Big 8 deal may affect admissions

Football fans might look elsewhere for their college education if the university is excluded from the Big Eight-Southwest superconference merger, said Dean of Admissions Leo Munson.

"It is hard to say what effect it (the merger) will have (on admissions)," Munson said. "Given the large population of Texas residents at TCU and the popularity of football in Texas, it might have some kind of unconscious effect on students' minds."

Football has wielded its power before at TCU when the football team went to the 1984 Bluebonnet Bowl, its last post-season appearance. In 1985, the number of incoming freshmen grew from 1,105 students to 1,213 students.

However, enrollment totals have shown both increases and decreases since 1985, Munson said.

Munson said he did not think exclusion from the merger would make a significant difference in enrollment statistics but said he has no prior experience to make a comparison.

"This is a situation that none of us can gauge," he said. "Something like this has never happened before. You can't go anywhere to a source or anything to study what to do about this."

But any event that is detrimental to the Officials scramble to answer questions

Since 1923, TCU and Southwest Conference athletics have been a tradition.

With one phone call, all of that may change.

SWC athletic directors and university presidents are scrambling to answer the flood of questions unleashed late Monday when the Big Eight Conference announced it has extended invitations to the University of Texas, Texas A&M, Texas Tech and Baylor universities to join its league for the 1996-97 season.

"The Big Eight Conference is continuing to explore all opportunities to position the member institutions in the best possible scenario for football television rights beyond the 1995 season," said Big Eight Commissioner Carl James in a statement released to the public. "We are conducting ongoing, daily discussions with our athletic directors in regard to football television matters and will continue to move forward in negotiating an arrangement that is best for our institutions."

Officials at TCU, Rice, SMU and Houston were informed by conference call Monday that they had not been invited to join the Big Eight.

"A very private proposal was made by the Big Eight people to A&M, Texas, Baylor and Texas Tech to join their conference," said TCU Athletic Director Frank Windeger. "The Big Eight people went straight to the four schools with their proposal rather than contacting the SWC officials first."

"It obviously took me by surprise. I am very disappointed that we weren't included," he said. "I thought the Big Eight people would wait until a television contract was finalized before they made any type of proposal to the SWC."

University of Houston President James Pickering said he was surprised by the Big Eight's sudden announcement.

"I am stunned and amazed by all of this," Pickering said. "The coalition that is being formed would remove Division I athletics from the accessibility of where 90 percent of the people live in Texas. What kind of perceived image will this project of athletics in 21st-century Texas?"

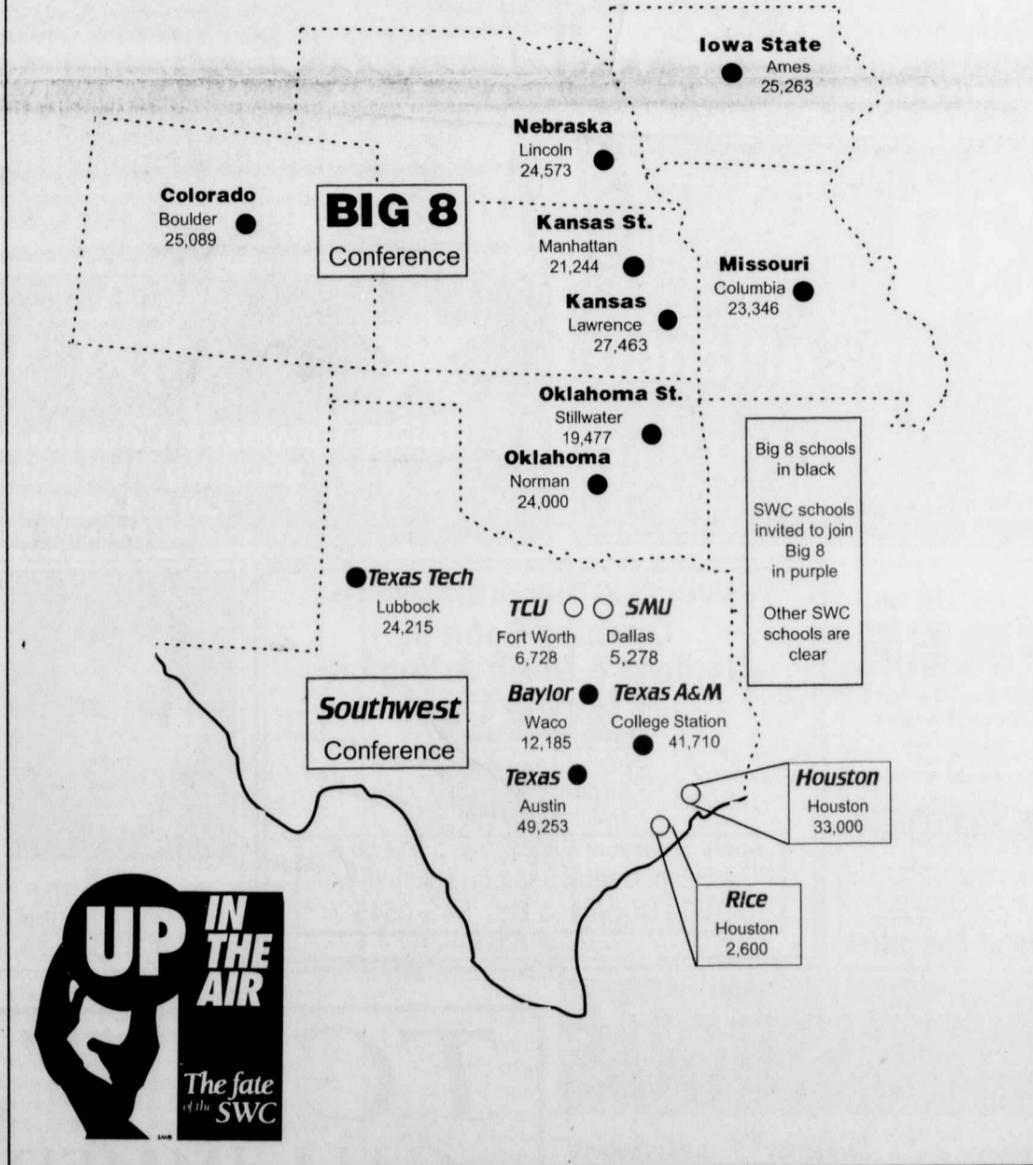

Big Eight officials have asked the four schools to decide by Friday if they will accept the invitations to join the conference.

"The situation regarding the structure of the Southwest Conference is still in flux," said SMU President Kenneth Pye. "The institutions invited to join the Big Eight have until Friday to respond. Until those institutions decide whether to make a change and perhaps afterwards, the range of options available to SMU will be unknown."

NASA workers charged

HOUSTON (AP) — Nine men, including two NASA employees and a partner in a consulting firm headed by former NASA official James Beggs, were accused of involvement in a kickback and bribery scheme at the Johnson Space Center.

The charges stem from a 20-month federal investigation in which agents posed as executives of a fictitious company.

NASA Inspector General Bill Colvin said NASA had more than 400 criminal fraud investigations under way.

'Bumped' fliers can sue

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court is letting people "bumped" from oversold airline flights sue in state courts to recover their financial losses.

The justices let stand a ruling that said such lawsuits are not precluded by federal regulation of the airline industry.

Tuesday's action set no legal precedent. But its effect, for now, is to give inconvenienced air travelers their day in court.

Former CIA agent charged

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a case with Cold War echoes and implications for future U.S.-Russia relations, a former top CIA counterintelligence officer and his wife were charged with selling national security secrets to the Kremlin.

Amnesty observes Human Rights Day

BY VANESSA SALAZAR
TCU DAILY SKIFF

Carolyn Allen strikes a match and slowly touches the tiny flame to the wick of the candle in front of her. As the light catches, she blows the match out and the dim interior of the chapel engulfs her once more. She sits back in her pew, closes her eyes and begins to meditate. Allen, like others, is participating in the 24-hour candlelight chapel vigil being held today in recognition of Human Rights Day.

The TCU Amnesty International chapter works to free political prisoners held captive throughout the world because of their beliefs, color or sex, said Angela Kaufman, a junior religion and philosophy major and coordinator of TCU's Amnesty chapter.

The celebration of Human Rights Day was postponed until today because the original date fell during winter semester finals. The rescheduling of the observance, however, has brought about several events that will be offered to the student body today.

A noon candlelight vigil will begin the official observance of the day at Robert Carr Chapel. A sermon will be given at the beginning of the vigil by the Rev. John Butler, head of University Ministries.

"We hope everyone will attend regardless of their religious or denominational preferences because of the importance of this kind of event," Kaufman said. "We've tried to make this (vigil) as broad and diverse as possible."

At the vigil, visitors will be encouraged to write letters to governments around the world, urging them to free the political prisoners they may be holding without a valid reason. Case briefs of captives will also be available with addresses on where to send letters requesting the captives' release.

"But one of the things we're encouraging at the vigil is prayer or meditation or just being alone and thinking about the issues we're trying to bring forward," Kaufman said.

In addition to the candlelight vigil, an information and education area will also be open in the Student Center from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. Information on AI beginnings, what the group is and what it stands for will be available.

Black silhouettes will be pasted on walls throughout the school. Each figure represents a real person who is being held prisoner somewhere in the world, Kaufman said.

"The silhouettes is an idea we got through the Amnesty International USA chapter where we saw it on a pamphlet," Kaufman said. "We get a lot of campaigns, and instead of having a picture of the person on the front, there is just a silhouette because a picture was not available."

The silhouettes posted around campus offer information on each person they represent: their name, age, the date they were killed or kidnapped and their native country.

Many students are unaware of the injustices being committed and fail to respond because they don't relate to it, Kaufman said.

"I think one reason people don't get involved with Amnesty is because you don't see effects immediately and you don't see effects here," she said. "It's more international than many service organizations and it's more long-term."

"They are going to provide support no matter what happens," he said.

The university needs to understand and define the situation before reaching a conclusion about the announcement, Roach said.

"It is my understanding that no one has finalized what is going to happen (to the Southwest Conference)," Roach said. "I think there has been a lot of overreacting locally to this announcement. We need to make sure the decision is carved in to stone before we come to any conclusion."

Athletic fund-raising contributed just under a million dollars to last year's annual budget, Roach said. From 1986 to 1992 fund raising for athletics has remained constant with slight increases every year.

EDITORIAL

When Big Eight officials did not invite the university to join its athletic conference, followers of TCU athletics should not have been surprised.

The Big Eight is one of the most competitive athletic conferences in collegiate sports. TCU's record against those teams is dismal, and attendance at athletic events is poor. So why would Big Eight schools want to invite us to join?

In the 1993 football season Nebraska was in the running for the national championship; Colorado won the Aloha Bowl; and Oklahoma beat Texas Tech 42-10 in the John Hancock Bowl.

In contrast, TCU lost to the Big Eight's last place finisher, Oklahoma State, by 5 points; to OU by 32; and to Texas A&M by 51. TCU cannot compete in the football big leagues.

The same holds true for men's basketball.

The University of Kansas men's basketball team has gone to the Final Four and won the national championship over the Sooners in 1988. OSU, OU, KU, Missouri and Kansas State have basketball programs with consistent winning traditions.

In contrast, TCU men's basketball team has gone to the National Invitational Tournament only once during coach Moe Iba's tenure. Currently the team is tied for sixth in SWC play.

Football and men's basketball are cited because they are the most watched and followed of collegiate sports. They attract television coverage, which pumps money into the schools. Adding TCU to the conference would not mean adding money to Big Eight coffers.

In addition, support for the university's athletic events pales in comparison to the Big Eight schools. The average game attendance over the past five years for TCU football and men's basketball is 26,391 and 3,893. Even the smaller schools in the Big Eight such as Oklahoma State average 34,194 at football games.

Until TCU can consistently win and maintain the support of its fans, it should not expect to be offered a chance to play with the best.

These calls are no joke

The ringing of the telephone sounded loudly in the silent dorm room.

Out of laziness, I let the answering machine catch the call. If it were truly important, I could always pick up the phone. The message played.

The prompting beep followed. Then nothing.

Nobody said anything. It's too much to imagine that the person on the other end didn't know the next step in the process was to actually leave a message. It was like whoever was calling was listening to the room, like they were just waiting for me to give into my guilt at being home but unwilling to answer the phone. It wasn't until I thought I heard someone breathing into the phone that my imagination began to run wild. Images of some pervert (who for some reason resembled the killer in "Silence of the Lambs") who gets his kicks out of scaring women danced through my head.

Finally, the machine clicked off and once again the room was silent. Closing the window and lowering the blinds was a feeble response but the activity helped me calm down a bit.

In remembering that phone call and the countless others similar to it that I've had the "pleasure" of receiving in the past, I began to get angry. Because in remembering, I am forced to acknowledge that my femaleness brings with it an inherent vulnerability. Now don't get me wrong. I can willingly admit that men are, in general, physically stronger than women. It's how men choose to use that advantage that scares me.

My first experience with the realization that all touches males give aren't innocent unless it was by mutual consent came, ironically, outside a church. Morning service had just concluded. At some point I had sat in something and I went to the bathroom to wipe it off. I figured no one would notice that the spot was just under my butt, high on the back of my thigh. A man who followed me out of the building stopped me and said, "Excuse me, you have a spot on the back of your dress."

Before I could let him know that I was fully aware of the spot, he began to wipe at it. The shock of this complete stranger touching me in a rather familiar way was surpassed only by the humiliation I felt when I realized that his wife and kids were standing right behind him looking on.

The funny thing about it is that afterwards, I felt as if the whole situation had been my fault. Although, how I came to that conclusion is anybody's guess. I imagine that must be a small taste of how the rape victim feels. I didn't tell my parents because I was extremely embarrassed and I didn't want to upset them. Besides, my father was, and still is actually, rather protective and I didn't want to inspire any ugly scenes.

Every since then I find myself constantly evaluating touches, gestures and comments from male friends and acquaintances. Does the touch of his hand on my shoulder make me feel uncomfortable? If so, do I tell him? Should I risk offending a friend over what was a totally innocent remark that didn't sound so innocent to me? What do I do if the comment wasn't as innocent as I assumed it to be and my reply was accidentally encouraging?

I don't have any answers to these questions. The hardest part of the whole situation is that there are no answers. It's just a fact of life that every female has to deal with.

And that, my friends, is extremely frustrating, especially to the career minded women of the 90s.

SYNDICATED COLUMNIST JEFF GREENFIELD

Delaying the Olympic moment

Let me introduce myself. I am the Winter Olympics' No. 1 fan.

I know that may seem unlikely, given my big-city upbringing, my lifelong lack of enthusiasm for falling down a mountain while wearing sharp wooden sticks on my feet and my general belief that the ideal winter sport is snorkeling in some tropical body of water.

But I admit it: The Winter Olympics have me completely hypnotized.

For one thing, there are sports on display here that have opened up whole new worlds for me.

Take the biathlon, whose practitioners are called biathletes. (I don't know what a person's sexual orientation has to do with the Olympics, but let that pass.)

Here is a sport where uniformed people race across the frozen landscape on skis, stop and shoot at targets with rifles. Every time I watch this event, I realize I am looking at the last sight my ancestors had of Europe: uniformed men on skis shooting at targets (actually, they were shooting at my ancestors).

Or consider the luge. The expert analysts watch this event and can explain why every twitch of the foot, every twist of the neck, is the key to victory and defeat for the slider. (I always thought a "slider" was a cheap, greasy hamburger, but let that pass.)

I look at the luge and see something completely different: It's the only athletic event you can compete in if you are dead.

Even beyond the events themselves, however, is the nature of the coverage. CBS having paid hundreds of millions of dollars for the right to broadcast the Olympics, one of its top executives woke up a few weeks ago, slapped his forehead and yelled, "My God! Norway is six hours ahead of New York!"

In other words, when a downhill ski race is going on at noon, it is 6 a.m. on the East Coast of the United States. When the evening skating events are taking place, it is the middle of the afternoon in New York — a time when millions of viewers prefer to watch the soap operas and talk shows, not the dazzling triple yutzes and full Nelsons of the figure skaters.

So CBS is doing what any network would do if it had paid hundreds of millions of dollars. It is airing the events in prime time. What this means, in practice, is that viewers wake up at 7 a.m. to hear that an American has won the Downhill Multiple Trauma Freestyle, but actually get to see the event around 9 or 9:30 in the evening.

This gives CBS plenty of time to run heartwarming features about the athlete's family, friends, trainers, clothing suppliers and transmission-repair specialists, thus stretching an event that lasts a minute and 20 seconds into a two-hour prime-time ratings winner.

It makes me appreciate all the more the technological wonders that are the modern media: Today, videotape instantly captures the Olympic event as it is happening. Digital editing enables every split second of that event to be stored and recalled at the touch of a button. Communications satellites, orbiting in geosynchronous orbit 22,000 miles in space, enable signals from Norway to be beamed back to the United States at the speed of light.

And after the deployment of all of this incredible technology, we viewers get to see the event 14 hours after it's happened.

The same thing could have been accomplished back in 1952 by shooting film and flying it back to America before putting it on the air.

Just imagine the implications if — to take a ridiculously hypothetical example — two American figure skaters began taking punches at each other during a practice. I can hear the promos now: "Assault in Lillehammer! See It Almost Live — In Just 12 1/2 More Hours!"

Jeff Greenfield writes for the Universal Press Syndicate.

COLUMNIST BEN JOHNSON

So it's just one more candle, huh?

Well, here we are, yet again, Feb. 23. My birthday. Yippee.

Birthdays are pretty weird. In our rush to make sure everyone has his or her 15 minutes of fame, birthdays always seem to be an excuse to make everyone feel like they're important, even if it's only for a day.

Everyone always seems to think the world is supposed to go into some kind of time warp just because they were born on a certain day. I've had more friends than I can count complain one year or another about having tests, papers or just a lot to do on their birthday.

Please. Do you think the world's going to stop for you just because it's the anniversary of your mother's 34-hour labor?

Granted, some birthdays are events of monumental proportions. I knew since I was around 7 years old that 2/23/88 would be the date I could drive, and that 2/23/93 was when I could stop worrying about being carded.

Age 18 is also a big one to a lesser extent. You get to feel like you can negate the vote of that member of your family you always disagree with politically. Of course, guys have that selective service card to send in, so they can register for the "die for your country" lottery should it ever come back.

But after your 21st birthday, the excitement pretty much comes to a screeching halt. Once you hit 22, there just aren't any more birthdays to look forward to anymore. Twenty-five will be nice because the car insurance finally goes down. But really, the major ones of any importance that are left are a big deal for other reasons.

The only pivotal ones left are the ones like 30, 40 and 50. The ones that don't do anything but make you feel old. The ones where everyone sends you big black balloons with "Over the Hill" on them, and you get depressed and do a gray hair count.

Even 65 won't be a big deal by the time we get there. Social Security will probably be long gone by the time we get to that age, and with medical improvements, we'll most likely have another 10 to 15 good working years in us anyway.

So birthday number 22 here just seems a little anticlimactic.

I don't even remember most of my birthdays. Except for birthdays number 16, 18 and 21, I couldn't tell you the first thing about what I did for my other birthdays. I do have a fleeting memory of my fourth birthday, but only because it's one of the only memories I have between birth and about age six.

Birthdays just get built up to be these monumental events, and then never seem to be that big a deal once they finally come. It's the other "unimportant" days that are usually more memorable. I couldn't tell you the first thing about my 17th birthday, but I will never forget coming to Dallas with a group of friends the weekend after it.

And then there's the whole business about friends being obligated to do something for you, even if they really don't have the time.

It always starts out with a card or something, just so they can let you know they remember when your birthday is. Then you feel like you have to get them a card for their birthday. The next year they may take you out for dinner, so you have to do the same for them, or you'll look like a loser. Then the stakes move up to presents, and you have to get one of equal or higher value on their special day.

You know, this is the same way the arms buildup got started. Pretty soon you've got a Cold War of birthday presents. I even had a friend of mine get mad at me for a while because I was too busy for her to take me out.

So don't bother asking me if I had a good birthday. It will probably be just another average Wednesday.

But let me tell you about last weekend... Ben is a senior broadcast journalism/political science major from Edmond, Okla.

Students respond to athletic merger

"I think the Big Eight basically looked at who could bring in the revenue. They are only inviting the top football schools in the conference, so it is clear why they don't want TCU."

Lance Henzl, a junior finance major

"It is too bad that TCU got left out, but if you have ever been to a home game here then you would understand. The fan support is definitely lacking here. With our fan support we don't deserve to be in the Big Eight."

Scott Delamore, soccer player and junior marketing major

"It seems that the breakup of the SWC was somewhat inevitable, but I hope that TCU is able to join the other SWC schools in the Big Eight."

Clark Davis, sophomore accounting and Spanish major

"By looking at our past attendance record with Big Eight schools such as Oklahoma and Oklahoma State, we have proved that there is a market for the Big Eight in Fort Worth."

Jason Foster, sophomore finance major

"I don't think the move will help the teams that go to the Big Eight, because those teams will still recruit and play the same, so they won't get any better."

Kelly Warfield, junior interior design major

"I feel like if Baylor, Texas, Texas Tech and Texas A&M go to the Big Eight, then we are going to have to either look for another conference or our sports program will have to drop a division."

Blake Gore, football trainer and junior business major

"I wish the SWC would stay together, but that doesn't look like it is going to happen because they have been talking about splitting up for a while."

Alan Wyles, baseball player and junior math major

"I really don't know what to think. I am curious as to what will happen to the athletic program here and what will happen to programs like soccer."

Sarah Suess, soccer player and freshman premajor

"The loss of money from football and basketball will hurt the smaller athletic programs. We might have to play more in state games and take more bus rides rather than plane trips."

Jeff Sommer, soccer player and sophomore psychology major

"If we end up an independent school, then we won't have the chance to create rivalries with other schools, because we won't consistently be playing the same schools."

Brian Hegna, senior marketing major

"I think the SWC should have asked other schools to join the conference to make the SWC stronger, instead of looking to merge with the Big Eight and making it stronger."

Michael Shorey, soccer player and physics major

"What the Big Eight Conference doesn't realize is that it will be hurting itself, because by bringing in more quality teams they will be jeopardizing their winning percentage and their chances at bowl games."

Colin Cremin, junior history major

"I think it is completely fair. The Big Eight puts out good football and basketball teams every year, and TCU has been unable to do that for quite some time."

Students of the College of Fine Arts and Communications will dance, sing and act this weekend to raise money for the TCU Guild's scholarship endowment.

The students will perform in the Guild's production of "Company," a play written and composed by Steven Sondheim.

The Guild awards a scholarship every year to one student from each of the college's departments. Seven students were awarded scholarships last year, but eight students will receive awards this year as a result of the split of the speech communication department into speech communications and speech and hearing disorders.

Emma Baker, director of scholarships and student financial aid awards, said the Guild scholarships are some of the oldest awarded at the university. The endowment has been in place since 1960, she said.

"The awards are $2,800 annually," she said. "The actual award depends on the earnings of the endowment."

"Company" Director Steven Brees said all the departments of the College of Fine Arts and Communication were involved in the annual scholarship fund-raiser.

"The theater department is supplying the designers and the director," he said. "The music department is providing the musical director as well as the 20-piece orchestra in the pit."

"The cast is a mixture of dance majors, theater majors and music majors," Brees said. "The art department provided the design for the posters. The radio-TV-film department has provided radio commercials and public service announcements and is airing them now."

"All of the departments in the college have contributed to the production, which is why it is a big deal for us," he said.

The production offers fine arts and communication students a chance to give something back to the college while producing a piece of art, he said.

"All of the proceeds, all of the ticket sales as well as other contributions that come in, go to this scholarship fund," Brees said. "It really is more than just producing a piece of art."

"Company" appeals to a wide audience, Brees said, and varies from the classic boy-meets-girl, boy-gets-girl, boy-loses-girl plot.

"It surrounds an unmarried man in New York and his married friends," he said. "It deals with the good side of marriage and the bad side as well as the good and bad of being single."

"It's about searching and looking for some answers as far as relationships are concerned," Brees said. "Most of us are worried about that throughout our lives."

Getting a new perspective on the play has been a benefit of directing the play 15 years after acting in it, he said.

"When I was single I related strongly to Bobby, the central figure of the single man in the show," he said. "I didn't quite understand what all this fuss was about."

"I kept thinking 'He's single, he's got all of these married friends and he's having a good time while they were all miserable,'" Brees said. "That's the way I sensed the show at that time."

"Now of course as a married man I sense the show differently," he said. "There is a great deal of good that these married couples have in addition to their problems."

"I like the show more now."

Brees is married to the show's choreographer and local actor, Linda Leonard.

The 4,800 tickets are selling quickly, Brees said, but good seats are still available.

Performances will be in Ed Landreth Hall Auditorium, Thursday through Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2 p.m.

Tickets are $10 for general admission, $5 for students. To reserve tickets call 921-7626.

Two languages help pathologists get jobs

By CAROL ANN COOKSEY
TCU DAILY SKIFF

Students earning a graduate degree in bilingual speech pathology stand a much better chance of securing a job after graduation, said Rachel Anderson, head of TCU's bilingual speech-pathology program at the Miller Speech and Hearing Clinic.

Speech pathologists provide rehabilitation services to clients in hospitals, private practices, community clinics and universities.

Anderson said bilingual speech pathologists who graduate from TCU are in demand because of the increasing Hispanic population in Texas, the lack of bilingual speech pathology graduates and the hands-on experience the university's program offers.

Bilingual pathologists help their clients learn how to speak and act as an advocate for hearing-impaired people, Anderson said.

"This program gives graduate students a chance to work with clients outside the clinic," Anderson said.

The clinic has a contract with three Head Start centers that cater to predominately Hispanic Fort Worth neighborhoods. Head Start is a federally-funded program for young children from poor families.

Graduate students get hands-on experience working with clients while receiving feedback from professors. Clients receive therapy at a lower price than private clinics. Clients are also assured of the quality of therapy because teacher supervision is provided, said Annette Giroir, secretary of the Miller Speech and Hearing Clinic. The clinic charges $16 for each therapy session as compared to private clinics' fee of $80, she said.

Speech pathologists are needed to provide therapy to individuals who have speech, language and hearing handicaps. Such problems might include: failure to develop speech, articulation problems, stuttering, language delay, disorders due to an accident or illness and disorders associated with mental retardation.

House supports open weekend parking

Freshmen students are one step closer to parking anywhere on campus during weekends as the Student House of Representatives approved a resolution Tuesday to open parking from 5 p.m. Friday to 5 p.m. Sunday.

Currently, freshmen must park in the Ranch Management parking lot at all times.

The resolution must be approved by the administration before it can go into effect, but House President Scott McLinden said he thought there was a good chance the administration would back the House.

"If they do back us on this there will be changes this semester," McLinden said.

Permanent Improvements Chairman J.R. Greene, who co-authored

"We feel that there is ample parking on campus during the weekend. People go home, and it is just making use of those spaces and increasing safety for the freshmen."

the resolution, said, "We feel that there is ample parking on campus during the weekend. People go home, and it is just making use of those spaces and increasing safety for the freshmen."

Last year, freshmen were allowed to park anywhere on campus from 5 p.m. Friday to 7 a.m. Monday. This was eliminated by the administration because students were not moving their cars before 7 a.m. Monday, leaving the faculty nowhere to park.

The House also addressed these items at its meeting Tuesday:

•The House newsletter, which went out for the first time Tuesday, will appear in the boxes next to the Skiff every other Tuesday to update the student body.

•A bill to help fund the Order of Omega National Honor Society's 1994 Greek awards banquet was tabled to the Finance Committee until next Tuesday.

•The level of success of all-you-can-eat lunches in Eden's Greens was discussed. The all-you-can-eat program is being done on a trial basis Tuesdays and Wednesdays.

Sullivan changes football coaching staff

Head football coach Pat Sullivan Monday hired former Auburn running backs coach Bud Casey, as the Frogs' new running backs coach.

The 54-year-old Casey filled the vacancy created when former secondary coach Paul Jette was hired Feb. 14 as East Carolina's defensive coordinator.

Other changes for Sullivan's 1994 coaching staff include:

- Pat Henderson, former Purdue defensive coordinator, being hired Dec. 16. Henderson is the new defensive coordinator and secondary coach.

- Charlie Rizzo moving from running backs coach to linebackers coach.

- Steve Brickley moving from receivers coach to quarterbacks coach.

- Reggie Herring, former defensive coordinator and linebackers coach, was hired Dec. 6 by Clemson University to coach linebackers.

- Pat Washington, former quarterbacks coach, was hired Monday to coach running backs for Baylor University.

Merger leaves TCU with few options

by Ty Benz

Sports Columnist

"The sky is falling! The sky is falling!"

Can you hear it? You should be able to as the (former?) Southwest Conference schools in the Dallas/Fort Worth and Houston areas quiver in their boots.

There has to be a lot of people in the athletic departments at TCU, SMU, Houston and Rice scrambling around in the shadows desperately looking for solutions to a problem that seems destined to bring ruin to them.

Yes, IT has finally happened: The SWC is breaking apart, and TCU is going to be left out in the cold.

And it is REALLY chilly out here in no-man's land now that Big Brother (Texas and Texas A&M) has left.

The little brothers, TCU, SMU, Rice and Houston, are now left to find their own destiny in the big, bad world of college athletics.

So does TCU have any options and, if so, what are they?

TCU does have some options, but none of them at the moment look very good.

1) TCU joins the Western Athletic Conference. This option is a hope and a prayer. The WAC has shown no interest in us before, so why now? This is a best case scenario: The SWC falls apart, so we'll just head west and Brigham Young, Utah, New Mexico and the rest of the WAC will welcome us with open arms.

Wake up people and smell the coffee. There are too many questions here. Why would TCU want to join a conference that has no TV rights, little publicity and mediocre teams? And why would the WAC want a team that has had little success, minimal fan support and a lack of interest?

TCU desperately wants to be in a conference. There is a lot of excitement at the end of the season when conference teams are battling for the title and a chance for post-season play. And a school always wants to have rivals. If TCU were an independent, who would be our main rival? There wouldn't be one.

The only possible answer to the second question is expansion. The WAC could expand into Texas and establish another recruiting base because high school football is still alive and kicking in this state. And the Metroplex is the heart of high school football, with schools like Dallas Carter, Arlington Sam Houston and Plano. This would be good for the WAC. But that's it. This is the only reason.

2) TCU helps form a new conference with the other three rejected schools and invites other academically strong universities in the South. The new conference would consist of TCU, SMU, Rice, Tulane, Oral Roberts, Tulsa, Vanderbilt, Centenary and the University of New Orleans. The Ivy League of the South would be formed.

They could also try to get Louisville and Memphis State to join. This would add prestige to the new conference. Two problems: These schools are not strong academically, and they wouldn't even consider it. Why join a poor athletic conference when one of your main focuses is sports?

But the main problem with the new conference is a glaring one: WHY WOULD ANYONE COME AND WATCH THESE TEAMS PLAY EACH OTHER? Who cares about the TCU-Tulane game? Nobody. This whole argument is based on TCU not wanting to be alone. Hey, let's get the other academically strong/athletically weak schools in the area to join us. This is not an appealing option either.

3) Become an independent. TCU doesn't join a conference (or isn't invited) and decides to try the risky life without ties.

This is simply not possible. Independent schools are a dying breed. The only icon left is Notre Dame, and it is thinking of joining the Big East Conference. Scheduling difficulties pose a constant problem. TCU's schedule would be full of road games against highly ranked opponents who are looking to fill their schedules with easy wins. It's difficult to win now. It would be nearly impossible to win with a loaded schedule.

Baseball team comes up short against Sooners

By THOMAS MANNING
TCU DAILY SKIFF

The TCU baseball team came close to pulling out a huge comeback victory against the Oklahoma Sooners Tuesday afternoon.

BASEBALL

But close wasn't good enough as the Frogs fell, 12-11.

Down 7-0 after three and a half innings and 12-5 after six and a half, the Frogs (9-4) rallied on two separate occasions, but time ran out on TCU and the Sooners (5-0) were able to pull out the victory.

Pitcher Reid Ryan (2-1) struggled early, and the Sooners pulled out to an early 7-0 lead. Ryan gave up seven runs and 12 hits in three and two-thirds innings, including home runs to OU's Rich Hills and Darwin Traylor.

But after being completely shut down in the first three innings, the Frog offense climbed back into it by being disciplined at the plate and taking advantage of the wildness of the Sooners' pitchers.

TCU managed to score four runs without the benefit of a hit in the fourth. They worked OU starter Steve Connelly and reliever Kenneth Gajewski for five straight walks, and when the inning ended the Frogs were right back into the contest at 7-4.

"We were a lot more disciplined today," TCU head coach Lance Brown said. "We stayed after their pitchers and were able to manufacture some runs to get back into it."

OU appeared to put the game out of reach with five runs in the seventh, highlighted by Hills' second homer of the game and a two-run shot by third baseman M.J. Mariani.

But the Frogs once again clawed back, and with four runs in the bottom of the seventh they were within three at 12-9. The inning was highlighted by a pinch-hit two run homer by Jason McClure.

The Frogs managed to score single runs in the eighth and ninth to cut it to 12-11, but it wasn't meant to be as shortstop Shannon Coulter popped out to OU first baseman Damon Minor to end the game.

The loss was the fourth straight for TCU after the Frogs began the season with nine straight wins.

But the comeback effort and scrappy attitude of the Frogs was enough to show Brown that the team, despite its recent losing streak, is not letting down.

"We had some mental lapses today, but the way we stuck with it and didn't give up was encouraging," Brown said. "We aren't going to win every game, but with the ability and the attitude of this team we are going to have success throughout the season."

The Frogs will look to snap their four game losing streak this weekend as TCU travels to Louisiana Tech. TCU's next home game will be Tuesday against Howard Payne University.

TCU gearing up to spoil Texas A&M title hopes

By DAVID JIMENEZ
TCU DAILY SKIFF

The TCU men's basketball team looks to improve its offensive execution and its home record Wednesday at Daniel-Meyer Coliseum against the Texas A&M Aggies at 7:05 p.m.

MEN'S BASKETBALL

TCU is only 3-7 at home this year. The Frogs (6-16, 3-8 Southwest Conference) are coming off a 65-64 home loss last Saturday to the SMU Mustangs. TCU shot only 37 percent from the field in the game.

"We got some good shots and got the ball where we wanted it go," TCU head coach Moe Iba said. "We just didn't get the job done and made too many mistakes."

The Aggies have not been making too many mistakes recently.

Texas A&M (16-6, 9-1 SWC) is currently in first place in the Southwest Conference. They are ahead of the second place Texas Longhorns by a half-game.

Texas A&M is coming off a 75-61 home win over Rice Saturday.

The Aggies beat TCU 80-64 on Jan. 25, in College Station. In that game, TCU junior center Kurt Thomas fouled out midway through the second half after scoring 22 points and grabbing 15 rebounds.

Thomas said that junior forwards Joe Wilbert and Damon Johnson give the Aggies a good inside game.

Wilbert leads the Aggies in scoring with almost 17 points a game while Johnson averages 10 points a game.

Add senior point guard David Edwards into the mix (13 points and eight assists a game), and Texas A&M has a dangerous frontcourt and backcourt combination.

"They have a good combination of guards and post men," Thomas said. "The guards believe in the post men and they do a good job of passing the ball back and forth."

Currently, TCU is tied for sixth place in the SWC with the Houston Cougars.

A win over Texas A&M would break a three game conference losing streak and a three game losing streak against the Aggies.

"We just have to keep playing hard and play good defense," Thomas said.

Lady Frogs hit the road looking to upset Aggies

By DAVID JIMENEZ
TCU DAILY SKIFF

The TCU women's basketball team looks to change its luck tonight against the Texas A&M Aggies.

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

The Lady Frogs battle Texas A&M at 7 p.m. at G. Rollie White Coliseum in College Station.

TCU (5-16, 1-10 Southwest Conference) is coming off its 10th consecutive loss on Saturday to the SMU Mustangs, 77-71. The Lady Frogs have lost their last three games by a combined total of 12 points.

Senior forward Donna Krueger led TCU with 18 points and 12 rebounds. Senior center Amy Bumsted added 17 points and eight rebounds.

TCU has not won since a 78-72 home win over Houston Jan. 12.

The Lady Frogs are currently in last place in the SWC and two games behind the 7th place Rice Owls.

The Lady Aggies, on the other hand, are in the thick of the Southwest Conference race.

Texas A&M (17-5, 8-2 SWC) comes into tonight's game only a half-game behind the Texas Tech Red Raiders.

The Lady Aggies are coming off a 79-66 win over Oral Roberts last Friday in College Station.

The Lady Aggies have won 22 out of 24 meetings vs. TCU. The Lady Frogs lost to Texas A&M, 81-70, Jan. 26.

TCU head coach Shell Robinson said after that game that her team was "outmaneuvered" by Texas A&M's inside game.

"We can't let their inside people dominate down low," she said.

Besides, the question that still hangs over TCU remains: If a bowl doesn't want to invite a small school with a low fan base, how would becoming an independent change this?

It wouldn't. Becoming an independent is not a feasible option for the university to take at this time. It would be a burden financially and an uphill battle that could not be won.

4. De-emphasizing athletics and becoming a Division II school. If the merger does happen, this is the option that becomes most realistic. Instead of pouring millions of dollars into dying athletic programs, TCU could switch to Division II, build successful, clean programs in every sport and refunnel money used for athletics to academic functions.

TCU becomes the leading academic school in Texas. The Ivy League of the South.

But this doesn't sound too good either, academically or athletically.

First of all, is TCU at the level of Trinity, Rice and Texas academically? There is a definitely different level academically, particularly in liberal arts and sciences. Could TCU catch them? It would be a long, difficult road.

It isn't too exciting athletically, either. Think about this exciting matchup: Sam Houston State visiting TCU for the title of the Southland Conference. Bet fans would come in hordes and fight each other for tickets. Uh, NO.

Fan interest and attendance is bad now. It would get even worse if the university went to Division II. If people won't come out to watch TCU-Texas, why would they come out to watch TCU-Stephen F. Austin? They wouldn't.

If it isn't obvious, none of these options look too good. This is a muddled situation that won't become any clearer until the other schools make their decisions Friday. Then it will be up to the university to decide which road to take.

But TCU students, alumni, faculty and fans in Fort Worth shouldn't feel sorry for themselves, because they played a major part in getting TCU to this level athletically.

The support hasn't been there athletically over the years. The attendance has been miserable, the support poor, the interest low. All this played a key part in the teams' demise over the years.

Let's face it folks, we got we deserved. Now we have to live with it.

NATO troops keeping peace in Sarajevo

By PAUL ALEXANDER ASSOCIATED PRESS

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP)—The people of Sarajevo enjoyed another day of NATO-enforced calm Tuesday, but U.N. peacekeepers came under fire near another Bosnian city and five Swedish soldiers were wounded.

WORLD

The attack, near Tuzla 50 miles north of Sarajevo, pointed up the challenges facing the diplomats who met in Germany on Tuesday and others who will hold talks in Croatia on Wednesday seeking ways to end the 22-month war.

Tuzla has become one focus of diplomatic efforts since a NATO ultimatum forced Serbs to pull their heavy guns away from Sarajevo and brought Russia into the picture. Russian troops joined U.N. peacekeepers in Sarajevo, and Moscow quickly claimed a leading role in peace efforts.

In Moscow, President Boris Yeltsin proposed a meeting with leaders of the United States, France, Britain and Germany to work out a political settlement in Bosnia. There was no immediate response from those countries.

The head of U.N. peacekeeping operations, Kofi Annan, said U.N. troops hoped to open Tuzla's airport March 7 for aid flights to central Bosnia. Serb-led Yugoslavia objected, saying the airport is too close to Yugoslavia.

Tuzla, held by Muslim-led Bosnian government forces, is one of several places where fighting continues while Sarajevo is quiet.

The Swedish peacekeepers were wounded while patrolling in three U.N. armored personnel carriers in Ribnica, 20 miles southwest of Tuzla. Artillery shells wounded two Swedes, and a second attack wounded three more, said Squadron Leader David Fillingham, a U.N. spokesman in Kiseljak. He said the wounds were not life-threatening. Fillingham said he was unable to confirm who fired the shells.

Relief convoys and flights resumed in Bosnia on Tuesday after being stopped before the ultimatum in case NATO air strikes were ordered and fighting escalated. The United Nations said 13 planes dropped 99 tons of food into Gorazde, a besieged Muslim town in eastern Bosnia.

In Sarajevo, thousands of people were out on the slushy streets, while NATO warplanes flew overhead to enforce NATO's threat to bomb any artillery positions that shelled the capital. U.N. spokesmen said all artillery not removed by Serb troops besieging the city was under U.N. control or inoperable.

"The main thing is the Serbs stopped shelling, so we can freely walk out on the streets. Other things will be solved step by step, but peace is most important," said one resident out for a stroll, Enver Huseinovic, 58.

The diplomatic focus shifts Wednesday to Zagreb, the Croatian capital, after senior envoys from the United States, Russia and Europe met Tuesday in Bonn, Germany.

The Bonn meeting decided the Sarajevo ceasefire model should be extended to other beleaguered Bosnian towns, but Russia blocked consideration of additional NATO ultimatums. The diplomats also agreed to push Bosnia's Muslims, Serbs and Croats toward an overall agreement dividing Bosnia into three states.

The Zagreb meeting will involve Annan, the U.N. peacekeeping director; Yasushi Akashi, chief of the U.N. mission in former Yugoslavia; and international mediators, Lord Owen for the European Union and Thorvald Stoltenberg of the United Nations.

A main topic will be the possible U.N. administration of Sarajevo, which would be "very complicated," said John Mills, spokesman in Geneva for Owen and Stoltenberg.

The Bosnian government would be leery of giving up control of the capital, but it likely will be facing many similar hard decisions as diplomatic activity picks up.

ENVER HUSEINOVIC, Sarajevo resident

Lt. Col. Bill Aikman, U.N. spokesman in Sarajevo, said Tuesday that U.N. soldiers were still collecting artillery pieces that the Serbs abandoned because they could not remove them before NATO's 1 a.m. Monday deadline. He said U.N. forces had "effective control" of all remaining heavy weapons.

He some of the Serb guns were "frozen in position" and would have to be dug out of ice by pickaxe.

"Due to the difficulty of removal, these weapons will be disabled pending their collection, which could take up to two weeks due to the ice," Aikman said.

The New York Times reported Tuesday that Serbs had at least one gun position still manned around Sarajevo. A NATO spokesman in Naples, Squadron Leader John Jeffrey, said that was not correct.

three centers in attempt to wear TCU out. Texas A&M rotates sophomore Marsha McClelland, sophomore Kelly Cerny and freshman Marianne Miller at the center position.

Robinson said TCU must keep the game moving quickly and not let the Lady Aggies to dominate the pace of the game.

"We have people that like to get the ball down the floor," Robinson said. "We need to keep the pace up-tempo."

Texas A&M is led in the backcourt by sophomore guard Lisa Branch. Branch averages almost 16 points a game overall and over 18 points a game in conference. Branch scored 24 points against TCU on Jan. 26.

Despite recent problems, Robinson said she feels that the Lady Frogs will upset someone.

"Things are going to turn around for us," Robinson said. "We are going to surprise someone."

Baylor University President Herbert Reynolds said his school's board of regents will meet Wednesday to discuss the options the university faces.

"It would be improper to comment on where we stand on this proposal until after we meet with the Board of Regents," Reynolds said. "Personally, I would have really liked to see all eight SWC schools included in the merger. But I have no control over what institutions the Big Eight wants to affiliate itself with."

"Obviously a key thing involved with the offer was the pressure from the networks to wrap up some kind of television deal for 1996 as soon as possible," he said.

Reynolds said the offer must be approved by all four schools' boards of regents before the merger can become a reality.

Texas A&M's Board of Regents will meet Thursday to discuss the fate of the Aggies and the SWC.

"My concern is that Texas A&M makes the best decision for it and will most favorably affect the other members of the Southwest Conference," said Texas A&M Regents Chairman Ross Musgraves. "We have some responsibility and obligation to them, but our first obligation is to our own program."

University of Texas President Robert Berdahl would only confirm that the Longhorns had received one of the four invitations.

"All I can say is, we have an informal invitation," Berdahl said. "No decision has been reached. That would have to be made by the Board of Regents."

Whether the four SWC schools accept or decline the Big Eight's proposal, the SWC will remain a part of the College Football Association's television pact with ABC and ESPN through the 1995 season.

The Southwest Conference and Big Eight are currently involved in negotiations with ABC for a television contract that would pay an estimated $70 million over five years beginning in 1996. That contract would include some type of playoff game between the two conferences.

SWC Commissioner Steve Hatchell said the conference will continue the negotiations despite the Big Eight's proposal.

"We are proceeding with the present negotiations despite the new developments," Hatchell said. "Nothing is a done deal yet, and we are getting ahead of ourselves if we assume that the four schools are definitely leaving."

If the merger becomes a reality, TCU, Rice, Houston and SMU would be forced to find another conference with which to align themselves or become an independent along the lines of schools like Notre Dame, and the universities of Louisville and Tulsa.

Windegger said TCU might also look to the Western Athletic Conference or the Mid American Conference as possibilities if the SWC does indeed dissolve.

"The important thing is that we will be a part of the SWC for the next two years," Windegger said. "Obviously if the SWC does break up we will have to explore other options. The WAC and MAC are two conferences that have expressed some interest, and we will explore those possibilities when the appropriate time arises."

With schools like Hawaii, Utah and Brigham Young in the WAC, and Western Michigan and Ball State in the MAC, TCU could be looking at increased travel costs should the SWC disband.

TCU could also face huge losses in revenues from bowl games and TV contracts, because of its inability to put fans in the seats.

Of the four schools that weren't invited to join the Big Eight, none averaged more than 27,000 fans a game in football or 4,000 a game in basketball last year.

By contrast, both Texas and Texas A&M averaged more than 59,000 a game in football and Baylor and Texas Tech eclipsed the 35,000 mark.

"It is obvious that the dollar speaks very loud," said University of Oklahoma basketball coach Billy Tubbs in a telephone interview with the Skiff. "This is a can't-miss opportunity for all the schools involved because of the money that will be generated from TV and revenues."

"I think only four schools were invited because it means more money for each school if you split the same amount of money 12 ways rather than 16."

One idea under consideration should the merger become reality would feature Oklahoma and Oklahoma State in the Big Eight's South Zone along with the four SWC schools. Kansas, Kansas State, Missouri, Iowa State, Nebraska and Colorado would constitute the North Zone.

Tubbs says he is excited about the possibility of playing teams like Texas and Texas A&M on a regular basis.

"Anybody who is not looking for something new these days must have their head buried in the sand," Tubbs said. "It will be exciting to be playing in basically a new conference, and this is something that I think the fans will be really excited about, considering the rivalries that can develop out of this."

TCU head football coach Pat Sullivan said TCU is committed to remaining a Division I athletic status regardless of the final decision by the four SWC schools.

"I have talked with Dr. Tucker and the board of trustees, and they have assured me that we will continue to be a major player in Division I athletics," Sullivan said. "Nothing surprises me about the changing mode of college athletics these days. I think you will start seeing a lot of moves made by a lot of people before the next year is up."

TCU head track coach Bubba Thornton says people must remember that nothing is set in stone before they start jumping to conclusions.

"The merger is not complete, and until all of the schools are put in place, it hasn't affected us any," Thornton said. "I would be lying if I said I was happy about the proposal that has been made, but a lot of pieces still have to be put together before we start worrying about where we go next."
