University begins process of SACS reaccreditation

ON FRIDAY, TCU BEGINS THE THREE-YEAR process of institutional reaccreditation with the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools with a one-day campus visit by Dr. Gerald Lord, associate executive director of the SACS Commission on Colleges.

SACS-accredited institutions must undergo a reaccreditation process every 10 years. TCU's reaccreditation deadline is the end of 2003. The process involves an 18- to 20-month institutional self-study and a written report by late Fall 2002. A SACS reaccreditation team that includes faculty and administrators from peer institutions will review the report over the winter. The team will visit campus in Spring 2003 for follow-up investigation and make a recommendation on reaccreditation to SACS by summer. SACS commissioners will vote on the recommendation and issue a notification by December 2003.

Dr. Lord will begin his day here with an orientation session for TCU's Self-Study Steering Committee. In the afternoon, he'll meet with the Chancellor, Vice Chancellors and the "Glen Rose Group."

Alan Shepard (English) has been named director of the self-study steering committee, with Bob Seal (library) acting as associate director. Committee members include Sherrie Reynolds (education), Nadia Lahutsky (religion), Bob Vigeland (Neeley School), Efton Park (mathematics), Jill Laster (business services), Magnus Rittby (physics), Gene Smith (history), Anne Van Beber (nutrition), Bonnie Melhart (computer science) and George Brown (theater). Other members include Kristi Hoban (alumna), Marcy Girton (athletics) and Joan Rogers (trustee). Ex-officio members are Cornell Thomas, Nowell Donovan, Larry Lauer, Kelli Horst, Mary Lane and Ann Sewell. Dennis Alexander (advancement) will serve as editor for the self-study project staff.

The SACS self-study requires broad participation by many campus constituencies, including faculty, staff and students. Representatives from all constituencies will be invited to serve on special-focus subcommittees that examine specific areas of TCU's educational program, services and operations. The results of these examinations, together with any necessary recommendations for further action by the University, will be included in TCU's institutional report to SACS. The Self-Study Steering Committee is currently recruiting the individuals who will serve on the subcommittees. ♦

TCU publications office announces staff changes

DUTIES HAVE SHIFTED IN THE publications office to manage the growing workload for design projects from the TCU community.

Director of Publications John Maddox has returned to designing full-time as senior designer. "I enjoyed managing this talented department during a time of great growth, but I really missed being involved in the creative process from start to finish and working directly with our clients here at TCU. I am looking forward to putting all my creative energy into designing again," John says.

All requests for new design work should be sent directly to Gorland Mar, who is serving as interim director of the department. He encourages those submitting job requests to plan ahead by keeping him informed of upcoming projects and their due dates, even though the job is not yet completed and ready for submission.

Associate designer Jim Dodson will assist with scheduling incoming projects. Allie Regan, also a publications design associate, will assist with the direction of freelance artists. ♦

Flu shots available

IF YOU HAVE NOT ALREADY HAD A FLU shot this season, you can get one at the Brown-Lupton Health Center. They are available to students, faculty and staff at a cost of $10. Although the vaccine was late in arriving at all health care facilities, it is not too late to be inoculated against the current strain of influenza.

Stop by the health center Mondays through Fridays between 9 and 11:30 a.m. or between 1 and 4 p.m. Plan to be there at least 20 minutes. Those receiving injections must remain 15 minutes afterwards to make sure there is no reaction. ♦

Neeley School receives memorial endowment

THE THEODORE AND BEULAH BEASLEY Foundation is celebrating the 100th birthday of its founder, Dr. Theodore Beasley, by giving the M.J. Neeley School of Business a $400,000 memorial endowment earmarked for two fellowships supporting special research projects and stipends for TCU finance professors.

The decision to establish the Theodore Beasley Fellowships at the Neeley School recognizes Dr. Beasley's success as a Dallas insurance executive. Over the years, Dr. Beasley and his foundation have given TCU millions of dollars, including $1.25 million for Brite Divinity's ministerial training endowment and a $5 million scholarship for TCU students affiliated with the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). The Theodore Beasley Fellowships will support stipends and various research projects related to the financial industry's impact on the insurance field in areas such as risk management, real estate, insurance and financial services.

SPECIAL EDITION

January 2001

HORNED FROGS ON A MISSION

Emma Jackson

Facility Services

As a starry-eyed little girl in Mexico, Emma Jackson dreamed of being a dancer, even though the reality of her life there meant hard work and little time for schooling, much less dance lessons. She still works hard, as housekeeper for the Ballet & Modern Dance building where she's considered a good friend to faculty and students alike. Emma has shared their world of dance for the past seven years and her contributions are very much appreciated.

Emma is responsible for maintaining the building's three studios, keeping the mirrored walls sparkling and the floors clean and safe for the dancers. A surface that is too slick or too rough spells disaster for a dancer, so Emma mops the floors daily with a special mix of water and stage cleaner. "She works around our outrageous schedules ... she can't begin to do the floors until 10 p.m. most evenings after rehearsals are over," says Ellen Page Garrison, chairman of the dance department. And since there is only one housekeeping sink in the three-story building, keeping a spotless environment involves climbing up and down stairs carrying buckets of water.

"Emma is conscientious and thorough ... a real pro," says Ellen. "She has won everyone's hearts."

"She takes our main concern, the dance floors, as her main concern."

Ellen Page Garrison, chair of the dance department

OUR MISSION:

To educate individuals to think and act as ethical leaders and responsible citizens in the global community

Roger Fisher

Residential Services

Here's a man who is "housebound" in seemingly every aspect of his life. As director of residential services for TCU, he oversees the various components of on-campus living. From renovation of residence halls to selection of roommates, Roger's office handles the details of keeping a roof over the heads of 3,500 students.

But when he's not at TCU, Roger often can be found at what amounts to a second job ... volunteering for Habitat for Humanity. He is deeply committed to building houses for and with those who could not otherwise afford home ownership.

Roger devotes many Saturdays to doing whatever is needed at local Habitat building sites, often with TCU students in tow. In early October, he took vacation days to coordinate multiple shifts for a "blitz build," where several homes were finished in two weeks' time. The payoff is "dedication day" when a resident takes occupancy of their new home. Even better than seeing one house take shape is watching a rundown neighborhood transformed by new construction.

"Roger's commitment to Habitat for Humanity began years ago when he was on staff at the University of Missouri. When he moved to Texas five years ago, he and his wife continued to volunteer regularly."

Karen Baker, residential services

Kristin Lage

Athletics

Now in her eighth year on staff, Associate Athletic Trainer Kristin Lage combines the skills of a medic with the mindset of a mentor. Her daily routine working with student athletes from the football, women's basketball and men's and women's tennis programs fills her year with the emotional highs and lows that the teams and the individuals are going through. She also is director of TCU's accredited program to educate student trainers, one of just three in the state and the only Division I model.

"Everything is different, all the time," says Kristin, describing her multiple roles. Helping an athlete come back after an injury is the payoff for a trainer, but so is watching that process, according to Kristin. "I get to experience the growth of an athlete as a person," she explains.

"Kristin is someone students depend on, and she is highly - respected and trusted for her level-headed approach to problems."

Jack Hesselbrock, associate athletic director

Joanne Green

Political Science

Joanne Green is frequently mistaken for a student at TCU instead of an associate professor of political science which she's been for the past eight years. She chose the position as her first job after graduate school, largely because her interview visit introduced her to would-be colleagues who were closely involved in the lives of their students ... the kind of relationships she'd never experienced herself in the large, state schools she'd attended.

"Joanne is a wonderful teacher/mentor role model for her students," says colleague Jim Riddlesperger. "She is actively involved in the women's studies program, serves as a university pre-law advisor, helps direct the department's distinction program and serves as the director of our local internship program."

"Joanne's tireless efforts on behalf of TCU students makes her one of our finest faculty members. She brings a caring and empathetic voice to undergraduate students as they try to define their career and life choices."

Jim Riddlesperger, political science

Leo Newland

Environmental Science

Environmental chemist Leo Newland arrived at TCU in 1968, not long after the school's environmental science program came into being but a long time before saving the environment became "cool." His expertise is in bioremediation (using naturally occurring microbes to eat oil spills and other waste) but his students also view him as a whiz at finding internships and employment opportunities within the environmental field.

Leo says his professional connections are a natural result of the very active role he takes in the community, serving on various city environmental boards and advisory councils alongside local corporate executives. "It takes up some time but it means I find out about intern opportunities," he notes. He also continues to play a key role in TCU's partnership with Columbia University's Biosphere II project outside Tucson, Ariz.

There's one more area that commands Leo's time and attention ... BMWs in general and his own 1998 M3 in particular. He was the first president of the local chapter of BMW Car Club of America which he founded here with 27 members in 1977. Membership has grown to 1,000 and Leo awaits delivery of the next of the 15-plus BMWs he's owned over the years, the newest M3 due out in 2002.

"He's the heart, soul and mind of TCU's environmental science program."

Ken Morgan, chair of the geology department
