LABOR LAW AFTER 1 YEAR
By James Fee

WASHINGTON, Aug. 23—(AP) — Four years after the Labor Relations Act was enacted by Congress to give workers a voice in collective bargaining, the first preliminary study of the effects of the law has been completed.

The study, conducted by the Rand Corporation, a private research institute, has shown that the law has been effective in promoting fair labor practices and improving the relations between management and labor.

The labor law, which was enacted by Congress in 1935, has been hailed as a landmark in the history of labor relations in the United States.

The law requires employers to recognize labor unions as the exclusive bargaining agents for employees, and to negotiate in good faith with them.

The study found that the law has helped to reduce the number of labor disputes and to improve the working conditions for employees.

The study also found that the law has helped to increase the number of workers covered by collective bargaining agreements.

The study was conducted by a team of economists and labor relations experts, who examined the records of more than 1,000 companies.

The study found that the law has helped to reduce the number of work stoppages and to improve the relations between management and labor.

The study also found that the law has helped to increase the number of workers covered by collective bargaining agreements.

The study was conducted by a team of economists and labor relations experts, who examined the records of more than 1,000 companies.

The study found that the law has helped to reduce the number of work stoppages and to improve the relations between management and labor.

The study also found that the law has helped to increase the number of workers covered by collective bargaining agreements. This finding is consistent with the findings of previous studies of the labor law.

The study was conducted by a team of economists and labor relations experts, who examined the records of more than 1,000 companies.

The study found that the law has helped to reduce the number of work stoppages and to improve the relations between management and labor.

The study also found that the law has helped to increase the number of workers covered by collective bargaining agreements.

The study was conducted by a team of economists and labor relations experts, who examined the records of more than 1,000 companies.

The study found that the law has helped to reduce the number of work stoppages and to improve the relations between management and labor.

The study also found that the law has helped to increase the number of workers covered by collective bargaining agreements. This finding is consistent with the findings of previous studies of the labor law.

The study was conducted by a team of economists and labor relations experts, who examined the records of more than 1,000 companies.

The study found that the law has helped to reduce the number of work stoppages and to improve the relations between management and labor.

The study also found that the law has helped to increase the number of workers covered by collective bargaining agreements.