Dear Amon:

I read your editorial on "The Duty of Labor and Management" with a great deal of interest. One encouraging sign in this whole situation is that newspapers throughout the country are dealing more and more with labor-management-government relations in their editorials.

There is increasing evidence that at long last "the public's patience is," as you say, "being sorely tried." The main cause of this loss of patience on the part of the public seems to be union strikes to attain unreasonable demands. The public, in my opinion, are growing more and more concerned about union attempts to share, or even control, those functions which management must have in order to operate the business, and about union efforts to restrict the productivity of its members.

It was good to hear from you, Amon, even indirectly. Keep up the good work!

Sincerely yours,
