The Pilots' Strike

The pilots' strike against American Airlines, the nation's largest domestic carrier, is important because it goes close to the heart of air progress.

Starting last November, American put new DC-7s into the first non-stop service between New York and California. This was a substantial advance over previous service involving a stop at either Chicago or Dallas. American scheduled the westbound flight at seven hours, 55 minutes, and the eastbound at seven hours, 15 minutes.

A CAA check of flight records last Spring showed, however, that in a one-month period not a single westbound flight had been completed within eight hours.

Up to then, all domestic lines operated under rules fixing an eight-hour limit on pilots' scheduled flying. American sought waiver of this ruling and CAB granted it temporarily, setting a new 10-hour limit.

The Airline Pilots Association had filed a complaint which led to the CAA time check. It continued to be dissatisfied after the waiver and American's revised schedules adding 30 minutes to the westbound trip and 20 to the eastbound. The union has supplied the initiative for the present strike against scheduled DC-7 operations.

The association founds its protest on the issue of safety. It argues that pilots who are compelled to be at the controls more than eight hours are not fit to cope with the flying problems that might arise.

However, comparison with the overseas operations of international carriers like Pan-American casts some doubt on the reasonableness of this argument.