

Just as the governor, during her campaign, rallied ancient political enemies to her standard, so have affairs of state since her election served to bring together other groups of the Democratic party in Texas that might not otherwise have had much in common, politically.

The present state of affairs was not brought about by any question as to the efficiency of women in office.

It is merely a result of the humoring of "isms," without which any political subdivision in government would be much better off.

Whenever an election is won by prejudice it is hard to expect the best results in government.

AND NOW WHAT ABOUT IT?

YESTERDAY The Times Herald printed a 64-page paper.

A week ago it printed, for the second time within three weeks, a 60-page paper; and the very day it did so, the Kansas City Star broadcasted a boast of having printed a 58-page paper.

In Kansas City that was the largest regular daily newspaper ever printed.

In Dallas The Times Herald was the publisher of this city's largest paper.

But that was a week ago.

On Friday The Times Herald printed 64 pages—exceeding all records in the South for a regular business edition of a daily newspaper.

Certainly there is a reason, and concentrated circulation is not it. It is "reader interest."

The policy of being fair, fearless, and tolerant is, after all, the winning policy.

It is a policy that means that all of the news that is fit to print is being given to the readers all of the time.

This is not a boast—it is a comparison.

The largest daily newspaper in Kansas City, a city almost twice as large as Dallas, boasts of publishing a 58-page daily newspaper.

And citizens of Dallas are not surprised, nor is The Times Herald boastful, when it makes reference to its achievement in printing a 64-page newspaper, without a line of complimentary advertising, but representing only a day's business in a day's paper.

HURRAH! ANYWAY.

AMON G. CARTER, publisher of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, was put off the field during the A. & M.-Texas U. football game for "rough playing."

It seems he yelled "Hurrah for A. & M. and Dan Moody!"

If he had shouted "Hurrah for A. & M. and Woodrow Wilson"—or George Washington—or Jefferson Davis—he could have stayed.

My, how sensitive we Texans are becoming in this year of road building!

The thanks of more than 100 of the less-thankful were perhaps expressed Thursday.

Senator Borah has at least temporarily switched his activity from a demand for recognition of the Bolsheviks to a request that submarines be outlawed.

Texas lawmakers and others have urged the repeal of the federal inheritance tax. They ought to, regardless of whether they expect to leave anything behind or not.

Marcellus E. Foster, of the Houston Chronicle, a University of Texas regent and a colonel on the governor's staff, seems to have suffered an editorial change of heart recently, judging by what he has written.

More Truth Than Poetry

By JAMES J. MONTAGUE.

THE END OF CRIME.

There were crooks in the brave days of old
Who clambered up porches at night,
Took watches and jewels and gold—
And vanished completely from sight.
But little they feared that the practice of crime
Was certain at last to undo them,
For the unscientific policy of the time

Had no modern means to pursue them.
But science has made a great stride
In suppressing the bandit and thug
Who plunder and loot far and wide
And stand in small fear of the jug.
No calm sense of safety the wrongdoer feels
Though he hang with his pals he is banded,
When he knows that swift iron clad automobiles
Are waiting to catch him red-handed.

All the thief needs to do is to guess
Where a hold-up is going to take place,
And inside of a jiffy or less,
Away will the thief catcher race;
And 'ere the garroter or robber attacks,
With a black-jack or sand-bag, his victim,
He'll be dropped by a rapid-fire gun in his tracks
And the power of law will have licked him.

The same wave is sure to abate;
The criminal, shaken and pale,
Has no choice but to turn and go straight
With this arm of the law on his trail.
The gunman and burglar will stand little chance,
However alert and quick witted,
Provided the cops can find out in advance
What crimes will be shortly committed!

legal points that are raised by the opposing counsel, shows a disposition not to be over-technical, giving both sides every reasonable opportunity to present their cases as they see fit. No better court-martial was ever assembled than this one.

The advantage which Colonel Mitchell possesses was given to him when the army made the con-

I do not know half a dozen people in the whole world to whom I can say anything. Accent on the anything.

What I mean is that with most people there are one or more subjects upon which it is absolutely useless to talk.

Upon this or that they have closed the door. Also locked it and thrown away the key.

And they regard this as a virtue, and preen over it considerably.

And it is right to have convictions that are rooted, principles that are solid, and conclusions to which one has definitely and finally arrived. For instance, it is just as well to decide that one will not budge so far as the Ten Commandments are concerned.

But small minds, coveting the name of being firm, are inclined to settle themselves in positions entirely untenable, to be positive where ordinary good breeding demands that all should be yielding, and tenacious where everybody who wants to be agreeable yields a little.

It is amusing to see how people put such questions to you as "Do you believe that Mars is inhabited?" "Do you believe it is going to rain tomorrow?" Also we are asked to say yes or no whether or not we believe in this religious London, Nov. 28.—Nursing homes, which are spread all over London, are old houses made over as far as possible to suit the needs of a small hospital, and of course, for no other reason, cannot be made as sanitary as our modern hospitals. Then again the profession of nursing is not nearly so attractive here as in the United States, and the majority of women doing this sort of work appeal to the victim as being in mentality just slightly above a good parlormaid and with the same lack of initiative.

Once given an order by the doctor they would follow it through an open window to their own peril, but
