Dallas Council Pledge Fight on Airlines' Move

Dallas' city council Wednesday was pledged to fight any move of airlines from Love Field to the proposed Greater Fort Worth International Airport six miles north of Arlington.

The formal statement issued at the regular meeting of the Dallas council said: "Efforts of the City of Fort Worth to obtain a new airport and the location of that airport are not subjects of comment by the city council of Dallas. Only if those efforts later threaten Dallas' air service do they come within our concern."

Fort Worth officials late Tuesday declined comment on the Dallas council's statement, but the Fort Worth council was expected to pass a resolution of its own Wednesday.

The Dallas statement continued: "We feel that the commercial airlines have a definite obligation to the people of Dallas who have played so large a part in their development in this region."

"Consequently, any attempt by the commercial airlines to center their terminal and passenger and freight loading points at an airport farther removed from Love Field to the inconvenience of the expense of Dallas and industry will be contrary to the city of Dallas which means available to us.

"The city council of Dallas has no desire to reopen the controversy, but in view of many recent rumors bearing on its policy should be stated so there can be no question of its position."
