Dear Mr. Monnig:

Yes, indeed, it rained carbonaceous chondrites in Mexico! The first few days apparently were a free-for-all, but then the Mexican army took over and apparently tried to stop any further export. Elbert King got away with a 15-lb. stone, and at least one other person (who prefers to lie low at the moment) retrieved some material. But the Mexican Government apparently complained to the State Department and there is some fear that any material brought into the United States may have to be returned.

Dieter Heymann was involved in the search for the February 5 Houston fireball. He, too, found nothing.

Best regards.

Sincerely,

Edward Anders
