Dear Darryl:

Libyan Glass

I am only mildly interest^{ed} in Libyan Desert glass because I have four pretty nice pieces I got many years ago from a London dealer who is not dead.

I'll go in with you as a matter of co-operation if it will be of any help, but I fear the cost will be almost impossibly high. Unless you're dead scared of losing them, why not offer about half as much as you might finally go and see what happens?

Mine were sold to me on a per carat basis but so long ago that I don't have records handy to say what they cost. Why don't you offer 50¢ a gram for a started, and try to stay away from carats? It mightnot hurt to offer even less.

Give me some more details as the matter matures. Personally I cannot get too excited about tektites as they don't seem nearly as interesting to me as meteorites, assuming one accepts the view that they are impact melted material.

Sincerely,
